In the past, multi-layer film has been widely used in the field of packaging as the food packaging material. For instance, it is reported in “Demarara Harikode” that LK Food Packaging developed a packaging material consisting of two polyethylene layers and two aluminum layers which were laminated with multi-layer film. The substrate of polyester-based resin or the like was coated with polyethylene, which resulted in poor heat-sealability. In order to improve heat-sealability and barrier properties of multi-layer films, it is known to provide an oxygen barrier layer made of triaxially laminated resins or resins blended in triaxial lamination as the inner layer, thereby improving packaging effect. However, such multi-layer films have an insufficient oxygen barrier effect. Further, it is also known to provide a gas barrier layer or layer in the vicinity of the outer surface of the film to reduce the degree of hydrolysis or increase the moldability of the film. For instance, a film made of polyvinyl alcohol, modified polyethylene or ethylene-vinyl acetate copolymer has been widely used. However, such films are disadvantageous in that they are difficult to peel and the oxygen barrier effect is not sufficient. Therefore, such films have not been used for the food packaging film. In recent years, a high oxygen barrier multi-layer film using a polyvinyl alcohol resin is disclosed. For instance, a multi-layer film has been disclosed in which a polyvinyl alcohol resin is laminated to a polyethylene terephthalate resin as the biaxial oriented film, and a polyethylene terephthalate resin containing, as its component, polyethylene tere
